

Offer Creation Beyond the Standard Framework

Most entrepreneurs know the headline version of Alex Hormozi's value equation. This presentation goes deeper into the parts people often gloss over: the language of the dream, how belief is built, why effort quietly kills offers, and the overlooked additions that can dramatically increase perceived value. Built from Brian Marshall's real-world sales experience across music, production, financial services, and client acquisition, this is a practical guide to crafting offers that feel obvious, credible, and easy to buy.

The Value Equation, Quickly Reframed

The classic formula is simple: Dream Outcome × Perceived Likelihood of Achievement ÷ Time Delay × Effort and Sacrifice. But the power is in how buyers feel each variable. Brian's point is that offer creation is not just math on a whiteboard. It is buyer psychology translated into language, structure, proof, and delivery. The top half amplifies desire and certainty. The bottom half introduces friction, doubt, delay, and resistance.

1

Amplify the upside

Increase the result people want and strengthen their belief that your process can deliver it.

2

Reduce the drag

Shorten the delay, lower the work, and remove emotional resistance before it becomes an objection.

3

Design the perception

Even a strong service loses force when it is framed vaguely, explained poorly, or packaged in the wrong language.

Dream Outcome Means Their Dream, Not Yours

The dream outcome is the specific end state your customer wants in their own life after your service works perfectly. It must be visible, measurable, and emotionally relevant. Brian's insurance example makes this clear: one prospect may want status, cars, and trips; another may care about mission, impact, and meaningful work. The offer may fit both people, but the wording cannot be the same.

❑ A weak offer often fails because the seller described a desirable future, but not the buyer's desired future.

- Define the end state

If you cannot point to a concrete change and say, "that happened," it is not a true outcome.

- Use buyer language

"More leads" is generic. "A calendar filled with qualified people you never had to chase" is vivid.

- Find the words upstream

Ask better opening questions, or think back to what you wanted three to five years ago and speak to that stage directly.

Perceived Likelihood: How Safe Does This Feel to Bet On?

Perceived likelihood of achievement is the buyer's internal answer to a practical question: Do I believe this will work for me, right now, with my money, time, and reputation on the line? This is where authority, specificity, and proof matter. People do not only buy outcomes. They buy confidence in the path. When belief rises, the same offer suddenly feels more valuable without changing the core service.

Authority
Proven Experience

Specificity
Clear Mechanics

Proof
Real Case Studies

If You Lack Authority, Replace Vagueness With Specificity

Brian's basketball example is the perfect contrast. "I'll make you one of the greatest players in the world" sounds impressive, but without authority it collapses. "I'll help you stop hitting the backboard and start shooting cleaner, centered shots by fixing your elbow path, wrist release, and follow-through using a five-step framework" feels tangible. The more authority you have, the less explanation you may need. The less authority you have, the more concrete your mechanism must become.

What buyers hear

Specific language signals that you have seen the problem up close and know how to solve it step by step.

- Replace broad claims with precise improvements
- Name the parts of the process buyers can visualize
- Show before-and-after patterns whenever possible
- Make proof easy to inspect, not hard to imagine

Time Delay Can Hurt Value — or Spike Curiosity

Time delay usually works against an offer. The longer the gap between paying and feeling progress, the more room there is for doubt. But Brian makes an important distinction: an unusually fast timeline can become an advantage if it breaks the buyer's expectations in a believable way. That is why dramatic claims like “six pack in one week” are so clickable. The timeline itself becomes part of the hook.

The lesson is not to make reckless promises. It is to identify where you can create early evidence of movement. If the full result takes time, design the experience so buyers still feel momentum almost immediately.

Effort and Sacrifice: The Quiet Offer Killer

This is the part many sellers underweight. Buyers do not only evaluate the reward; they also imagine the burden. Brian breaks that burden into three layers: physical effort, mental effort, and emotional effort. His double bass story shows how sheer physical difficulty can make a path unattractive. His music teaching example shows that even when people want the outcome, they may reject the process if it demands more focus, repetition, or emotional resilience than they can sustain.

Physical effort

If the process looks exhausting, inconvenient, or disruptive, many people opt out before they begin.

Mental effort

Long attention spans, repetition, and steep learning curves reduce the number of buyers willing to commit.

Emotional effort

Fear of failure, embarrassment, or slow progress can create more friction than the work itself.

Three Additions That Pour Gasoline on the Offer

Brian adds three practical levers that do not replace the equation but strengthen it: instant gratification, packaging perception, and risk reversal. These are not abstract branding ideas. They directly change how fast value is felt, how clearly value is understood, and how much downside the buyer believes they are carrying.

Instant gratification

Deliver something useful immediately: a guide, community, prep resource, or quick-start asset.

Packaging perception

Translate features into outcomes. Sell what it does for their life, not what it is called internally.

Risk reversal

Reduce the fear of loss with guarantees, done-for-you execution, or a structure that shifts downside away from the buyer.

✅ A buyer should feel movement fast, understand the value in plain language, and see a path where they are not taking all the risk alone.

A Real Example: A $5,800 Website + Backend Offer

Brian closes the framework with a real sale: a website system plus backend build sold for $5,800, structured over a three-part payment plan. The point is not the number by itself. It is how the offer was built. The outcome was framed around the client's business experience after implementation, not the technical stack. Time delay was addressed up front. Effort was minimized because installation was handled for the client. Risk was lowered through the payment structure.

Outcome-led framing

The offer described what business would feel like after the build, not just the components being delivered.

Reduced buyer workload

Done-for-you implementation removed both effort and uncertainty from the decision.

Lower perceived risk

The payment plan helped the client move forward without carrying the full emotional and financial weight all at once.

Key Takeaways for Building a Fire Offer

Do not stop at the textbook equation. Clarify the buyer's actual dream. Increase belief with authority, specificity, and proof. Shorten the delay between purchase and progress. Ruthlessly reduce physical, mental, and emotional effort. Then strengthen the whole experience with immediate wins, clear packaging, and meaningful risk reversal. That is how an offer becomes easier to say yes to.

01

Start with their language

Name the future they want in terms they already use and care about.

02

Make the mechanism believable

Specificity and proof often outperform hype, especially when authority is still growing.

03

Lower the cost of becoming successful

The easier it feels to start, continue, and finish, the stronger the offer becomes.

04

Design for momentum

Give buyers a fast win so the experience feels real the moment they commit.

Brian's broader mission is clear: help people build offers, businesses, and lives that fit who they actually are. That is a powerful standard for both selling and serving.